

MYTH	TRUTH
If I'm still single, something must be wrong with me.	Your identity isn't tied to your relationship status. You are already chosen, complete, and fully loved in Christ.
Being married to Jesus means I'm giving up on marriage.	Being married to Jesus means you're entering covenant first — which prepares you for a healthy, godly relationship with a future spouse.
I'll be ready for marriage once I meet the right man.	You prepare before the man arrives — by healing, maturing, and becoming whole in God.
My desires for marriage and love are unspiritual or distractions.	God gave you those desires — but He shapes them through purpose so they don't lead you off course.
My feelings should guide my relationship decisions.	Your feelings may signal something, but only God's wisdom and Word should lead your choices.
Having standards is why I'm still single.	Having God-aligned standards honors your worth and protects your destiny — not blocks it.
I can treat dating casually and still expect covenant results.	Covenant requires intentionality, not convenience. You don't stumble into legacy; you build it with God.
I'll get serious about spiritual things once I'm married.	How you steward your soul now determines the quality of life and love you experience later.
Men are only drawn to appearance, so I need to look perfect to be seen.	Emotional maturity, character, and spiritual alignment are what truly attract a godly man.
If it hasn't happened yet, maybe God forgot about me.	God's timing is never denial — it's divine development. You're not overlooked, you're being refined.
